

The Design Trend Steaming Ahead in Steamboat Springs

By Brianna Randall

teamboat Springs is a mountain town at the intersection of authentic and modern. Just shy of 13,000 residents, its alluring landscape draws in cowboys who ranch the rolling sagebrush valleys along with Olympians who revel in skiing the area's world-class powder.

Although it's known as a premier recreation destination with plenty of write-home-about amenities, Steamboat radiates a more inviting, laid-back feel than the flashier resorts to the east along the I-70 corridor. The neighbors are friendly, the skies are sunny, and the shops and restaurants—while increasingly high-end and gourmet—remain grounded in western heritage. It is a place that emanates a relaxed 'home on the range' feeling, yet is also a destination, currently experiencing the coming-of-age-like transition from small ski town, to luxury resort community.

Architecture trends are also changing, with Steamboat's newest builds embracing a mix of contemporary and traditional styles of design. Elk, deer and moose frolic next to luxury residences boasting swooping, gabled architecture, custom geometric light fixtures, and floor-to-ceiling windows that boast some of the best mountain views in Colorado.

Leslie Dapper, lead designer at Rumor Design + Redesign, reports that many Steamboat Springs homeowners are moving away from traditional rustic looks—heavy on the dark woods and ornate fixtures in favor of more contemporary design features.

"We continue to get requests for a 'mountain contemporary' style of design for both new construction and remodels," says Dapper. "All of our current redesign projects involve updating with cleaner, simpler materials."

According to Chris Paoli, owner of Colorado Group Realty, this trend is partly because as Steamboat Springs evolves to offer a "more complete destination experience" it draws in homebuyers who are interested in more modern architecture.

"From the culinary scene to the streetscapes downtown, we are appealing to a broader pool of buyers from markets on the forefront of the latest design trends-Dallas, Miami, California, or New York to name a few," says Paoli.

Paoli points to one of the homes he's listing at Steamboat's Alpine Mountain Ranch & Club as an example of how people are embracing a more contemporary style.

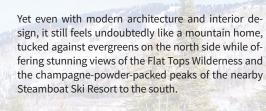

This five-bedroom, six-bathroom home is the Club's most recently completed home, and includes an open layout, sophisticated lighting, custom craftsmanship details, and energy efficient construction. The lofted 30-foot ceilings in the great room and kitchen give the feeling of living outside with no interior walls to block the view. The large, two-sided natural gas fireplace connects the main floor spaces, and draws the eye as a centerpiece with its blue-grey rolled steel siding and travertine tiles.

PHOTO BY: ROCKY MOUNTAIN PHOTOGRAPHY

SLEEK, CONTEMPORARY ARCHITECTURE BLENDS WITH NATURAL BEAUTY IN ONE OF COLORADO'S MOST CHARMING WESTERN DESTINATIONS

"The residence's design style focuses on the natural surroundings," said Paoli. "Large walls of windows bring in the mountain views, while the interior's clean lines and softer surfaces embrace a truly contemporary design."

It makes sense that the home would want to showcase the many outdoor amenities at the 1,216-acre Alpine Mountain Ranch & Club through its floor-toceiling windows. Club homeowners enjoy 900 acres of beautiful open space, including a stocked fishing lake, equestrian center with rolling pastures, five miles of trails, and even a backcountry retreat. The amenities don't stop at the gate, either—community members have access to private, gold-medal trout fishing along the Yampa River, membership oppor> tunities at the slopeside, five-star Alpine Mountain Summit Club at One Steamboat Place, as well as access to neighboring Catamount Ranch and Club golf course via a cart path that connects the two properties.

Recognizing Steamboat's emerging trend from traditional to contemporary design, the architectural guidelines at Alpine Mountain Ranch & Club give its owners the choice between traditional, transitional, or contemporary designs when they develop one of the ranch's 63 five-acre lots.

The newly listed home at the Club is on the forefront of contemporary. Dapper describes its design touches as a "mixing and matching of rustic and sleek". While still wood, the floors are a lighter color than displayed in past mountain homes. The trim around the windows is minimal black, but the kitchen and great room still feature an exposed wooden cross-beam that adds texture and warmth. The lighting is simple yet artistic. For instance, the kitchen's overhead light fixture was custom designed and locally fabricated as an artistic geometric centerpiece, featuring rectangular metal cross-pieces and inset LED strips.

Simple and sleek, rustic but minimal—apt descriptions of both the emerging trend in "mountain-contemporary" architecture as well as the spirit of the town it's helping to define. ■

